FRIENDS OF THE ARMY MEDICAL LIBRARY

Washington, D. C.

Contemplating the acquisitions of another quarter year and speculating upon how we are to shelve them, I cannot help thinking of their future. Who will ever read through or even casually examine the many hundreds of important looking books and pamphlete? The medical librarians? The savante? The searchers after truth? The professors or their students? I wonder.

As a species librarians are apt to be voracious readers, but at the time of their apprenticeship in the literary candy shops their stomachs became addled perhaps and now they can enjoy only the choicest tidbits of literature. Savants often look with disdain upon the reading of publications written by anyone unknown to fame in the scientific world. Research workers are often buried under the ruins of their hypotheses, their minds closed to everything save the fragments and details of their own investigation. Neither have the professors much time available for anything but their own speaking. Thus there remain only the receptive and open-minded people, the students in a wider sense, who can be counted as prospective readers for the newer acquisitions.

Even the students may be discouraged from much reading. Only a couple of decades ago too much reading was regarded as dangerous to the mind just as eating too much catmeal was thought to be heating to the blood. The old timers had a phrase for it: "Ex omnibus aliquid, ex toto nihil," meaning that we get something from every writer but nothing from all of them. Those who taught methods of study quoted many other fallacious apothegms to the same effect.

Such admonitions could have been followed easily in times when the means of spreading ideas was mostly by manuscripts, when books, even medical books, were in fact encyclopedias, containing all the available knowledge, and when the aggregate of four or five codices meant a library. For the leth century college boy it was sufficient education to read only one book such as the Margarita Philosophica of Reisch, from which he could drink all the wisdom of the seven liberal arts, with a few cups in addition. A medical student of that era was better off if he would stick to the big folios of the Continens of al-Raif or the Practica of some famous master because with all their hundreds of closely printed pages in his head, he was sure to be a physician of parts and one fully justifying the medieval monk's wise saying about One Book and its Reader.

Now everything is changed, knowledge, science, the means of spreading thoughts. Knowledge has grown so that no man's vision is wide enough to comprehend it even in a lifetime.

Consequently the encyclopedic quality of our literature has diminished perceptibly, and much effort is needed, along with the necessity of consulting many sources, for the composition of even a small monograph. In their search for truth the scientists penetrate deeper and deeper into the Unknown, and their excavations have unearthed more and more details. Thus the student has lost his talent for contemplation of the universe in its entirety.

This is the very reason why the saying of the medieval monk = ("Timeo unius libri lectorem") = is no longer true. Countless scientists have mined shafts without number in the great (Continued on inside back cover) mountain of the Unknown. The more shafts and the deeper the bottom of the pits of science, the more urgent it is for the miners to come up to the top of the mountain occasionally in order to review the findings of others and to gain some assurance that the shafts are boring in the right direction. By ascending to the daylight from their pits of research the scientists get fresh air, and a new point of view. There are many shafts, there are many miners, and there are many points of view.

Point of view. Is it not peculiar that in our mental activities we take refuge in so many imaginary "points"? There is our point of departure, our point, coupled with such prepositions as "Beside" or "To", there are our standpoints and our viewpoints or —— if it pleases youour points of view. The point of view is the point of our mental outlook. It is evidently not identical with our standpoint from which indeed we may decline to budge and yet the location of one is always the function of the other, since our viewpoint cannot be far away from our standpoint. However, one may have a standpoint without being able to view anything. Darkness, for instance, cannot be penetrated from any viewpoint if mental light is not at hand. Since Adam and Eve's day millions of people have observed the fall of an apple, but only a Newton was able to comprehend its significance.

By changing the distance between the viewpoint and the object we may acquire very different views. Difference in views are also due to factors in the makeup of the observer such as race, religion, education, environment, etc., not to mention the influence of climate, of the accepted form of government, and of nutritional and endocrine factors. Our views depend also upon the condition of our eyes as well as upon the extent of our visual field. This field may be artificially constricted and such will account for a seeming desire to avoid seeing what we should see. There are also many people who have types of congenital and acquired defects in their vision, who can scarcely have a normal view of things. There are scientists with mental scotomas, hemianoptics, monoculars, and there are those with telescopic vision, and those with ideas in their minds which seem almost to press upon their ocular pathways. Some of these we call fanatics, but many of them we must accept as normal people. But there is no cure for stubbornoses or stupidity and no surgeon who can extirpate malignant disease of the mind.

All this shows that viewe differ greatly, some of them being normal, while some are pathological. Since there are no two identical points in space, it may be assumed that there are no two identical points of view.

The ancient sayings of Plimy and of the medieval monk should not be considered too seriously, and there should be only one interpretation of the proverb concerning the Reader of One Books we should fear him because of his ignorance, his limitation, and his adherence to his point of view. The free man of the 20th century scientific world should have neither fixed viewpoints, standpoints nor fixed ideas. He should be liberal in learning about the views of others.
